

J.P. Morgan's Jing Ulrich named to Forbes' list of "world's 100 most powerful women"

What do U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, television star and media executive Oprah Winfrey, U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, President and Chief Executive of The New York Times Co. Janet L. Robinson, Xerox President Ursula Burns, Argentine President Christina Fernandez and J.P. Morgan Chairman of China Equities Jing Ulrich all have in common?

They have all been named to "The World's 100 most powerful women" by Forbes magazine. The 2008 list, representing the fifth annual ranking by the magazine, includes an eclectic roster of leaders in government, finance and business, news and media industries – before and behind the cameras.

Citing her role at J.P. Morgan, Forbes said: "Jing is responsible for building and maintaining relationships with the world's largest institutional investors, corporate clients and negotiating with executives at the helm of China's leading enterprises, government ministries, and regulatory institutions."

"It's a great honor to be selected for such a prestigious list," Ulrich commented. "I'm grateful to the senior managers and colleagues at the firm for all their support."

Ranking Jing as 95th on the list, Forbes noted, "Because of her in-depth knowledge of the China markets, Jing has been a key figure in shaping the international community's approach toward investing in the world's largest and most dynamic developing economy."

Speaking about the country's economic future, Ulrich said: "China's explosive growth has captured the world's attention. That puts J.P. Morgan in a unique position to facilitate mutually beneficial relations between our global clients and Chinese firms."

The magazine also noted that Jing established J.P. Morgan's Hands-On China series, "which has become a leading forum for views and research on the key issues in China's transformation." The series has hosted hundreds of corporate leaders, industry experts, academics and government officials who have attended conferences and discussed trends through the published version of the series.